Why would a shell be so hard? The shells of many gastropods that live on the seabed are made of a hard, brittle material called calcium carbonate. This shell is very hard and strong, and it can protect the soft body of the animal.

What do gastropod shells with ribs, tubercles, spines, and bumps have in common? They make it difficult for shell breakers such as crabs, lobsters, fish, and birds to do their work. But why does this elaborate shell sculpture protect the gastropod? It also functions as camouflage.
