I and Thou Stephen Gislason, I and Thou focuses on close relationships Innate tendencies are hard at work when people meet become friends lovers and spouses who end their relationships with arguments and fighting The same tendencies determine how family members interact and explain why so many families are dysfunctional When lovers form an enduring pair bond they often become parents and everything changes Close Relationships There are constant features of human interaction that emerge from deep tendencies These deep tendencies are expressed by other animals especially by our closest relatives fellow primates The path to understanding these tendencies involves an eclectic search through all human disciplines and a common sense that emerges from experiences with a variety of humans One challenge is to recognize tendencies that all humans share in one s own behavior and covert mental activities Another challenge is to modify and control negative tendencies A human tendency is to treat only a few other humans well members of your immediate select group and to be suspicious of and hostile towards everyone else Humans can learn to override this tendency and succeed to varying degrees at opening their minds to other sentient beings but this is a difficult task An average normal human supports a small number of close relationships that have strategic significance in his or her life These close relationships have different values and represent different investments of time energy loyalty and devotion
