

Measurement and Generation of Underwater Sounds

2.1 Electroacoustic Transducers

Acoustic signals are detected and generated with devices called electroacoustic transducers. These devices convert electrical energy into acoustic energy or acoustic energy into electrical energy. Transducer that converts acoustic energy into electrical energy has traditionally been called hydrophones or receiving transducers. Likewise, devices that convert electrical energy into acoustic energy are referred to as projectors or transmitting transducers. Many electroacoustic devices are used for both receiving and transmitting acoustic signals and are referred to as transducers.

In many instances, a bioacoustician has to construct his/her own transducer because of a special application requiring an unusual design or size, or because of budgetary constraints. The goal of this chapter is to provide sufficient information so you could, if necessary, construct transducers with a reasonable certainty of being successful, but without the need to become a transducer "expert." It is not our goal to provide an in-depth analysis of transducer material and design, which would be beyond the scope of this book. Those interested in a deeper discussion of underwater acoustic transducer material and design should refer to books by Wilson (1988), Bobber (1970), Huerter and Bolt (1955) and Cady (1964).

Most transducers convert energy from one form into another by using (a) materials with electrostriction or piezoelectric properties, (b) materials with magnetostriction properties, and (c) electrodynamics principles. Piezoelectric properties are found in some crystalline substances such as quartz, ammonium dihydrogen phosphate (ADP), and Rochelle salt. These crystals acquire an electrical charge between certain crystal surfaces when placed under pressure, or they acquire a stress when a voltage is placed across them. Electrostrictive materials exhibit the same effect as piezoelectric crystals, but are polycrystalline ceramics that have to be properly polarized by subjecting them to a high electrostatic field while in a melted form under high temperature and cured into a solid with the electrostatic field still being impressed. Popular electrostrictive materials are barium titanate and lead zirconate titanate, and they are commonly referred to as piezoelectric
