

DO'S

Clean up old, unused flags

You should always make sure you remove temporary flags, such as release or experiments flags, in your system once they've served their purpose and the feature has been released.

This will help prevent the accumulation of technical debt in your code. For that reason, make sure you have clear visibility of all the flags in your system and a plan to conduct regular audits.

Test in production

Testing in production is no longer daunting thanks to feature flags. You can test in a real production environment to validate functionality with a select number of live users such as internal users-QA teams- rather than a staging or test environment. If anything goes wrong, the feature can be easily and quickly rolled back by disabling it.

This way other users are none-the-wiser and any negative impact is significantly reduced as only a select few were able to access the buggy feature.

Monitor control of users

It's essential to have a system in place to control access to feature flags and grant selective access to teams in order to avoid the untimely deployment of a feature. Thus, it's important to carefully control access to flags and track any changes made.

This will help prevent someone accidentally triggering the wrong flag leading to disruptions within your system. The general rule of thumb is to only give users the kind of access they require to do their job, not more and not less.

Use progressive rollouts

Big bang releases always come with a high degree of risk. To mitigate that risk and once you've tested in production internally, you can then choose a small set of users to have access to your new features, monitor its impact and roll back if necessary to fix any arising issues.

With feature flags, you can progressively release features to a small group of users through canary releases, dark launches, beta tests or ring deployments before releasing to your entire user base.

Don't treat all feature flags the same

There are many categories of feature flags and toggles. From experiment and release toggles to operational and permission toggles, each offer different benefits and uses.

When considering different types of flags, it's important to use the right type based on your objectives. For example, experiment toggles are used for A/B tests and usually product teams are the ones that manage it.

Release toggles on the other hand are used to develop new features and are managed by development teams.

Don't use "ambiguous" names

The name of a flag should be clear, consistent and descriptive enough that teams know what it does and can easily locate it in the codebase. This makes it easier to find and remove the flag after it has served its purpose to avoid accumulation of technical debt.

Don't put feature flags everywhere

While feature flags can be used widely across a number of use cases, they're not the solution to every problem.

In fact, having too many flags will only increase the complexity of your code to the point where it becomes unmanageable. Thus, make sure you keep the number of flags in your system at a reasonable amount that you can easily manage to avoid a build up of technical debt.

Don't use a feature flag more than once

Reusing or repurposing a feature flag for another purpose it was not created for could accidentally trigger "dead code" or poor performing features which could negatively impact system behavior. That was the case for Knight Capital, the largest trader in US equities, who learned the hard way in 2012 due to the wrong use of a feature flag, which triggered old code and caused a stock-buying spree that cost the company $440 million in one day.
