

ii Global and regional food consumption patterns and trends

ii.1 Introduction

Preventing healthy diets and lifestyles to reduce the global burden of non-communicable diseases requires a multifunctional approach involving the various relevant sectors in societies. The agriculture and food sector figures prominently in this enterprise and must be given due importance in any considerations of the promotion of healthy diets for individuals and population groups. Food strategies must not merely be directed at ensuring food security for all, but must also observe the consumption of adequate quantities of nutrient-rich, good-quality foods that together make up a healthy diet. Any recommendations that affect food will have implications for all components in the food chain. It is therefore useful in this context to examine trends in consumption patterns worldwide and deliberate on the potential of the food and agriculture sector to meet the demands and challenges posed by this report.

Economic development is normally accompanied by improvements in a country's food supply and the gradual elimination of dietary deficiencies, thus improving the overall nutritional status of the country's population. Furthermore, it also brings about qualitative changes in the production, processing, distribution and marketing of food. Increasing urbanization will also have consequences for the dietary patterns and lifestyles of individuals, not all of which are positive. Changes in diets, patterns of work, and leisure – often referred to as the “nutritive transition” – are already contributing to the global factors underlying non-communicable diseases even in the poorest countries. Moreover, the pace of these changes seems to be accelerating, especially in the low-income and middle-income countries.

The dietary changes that characterize the “nutritive transition” include both quantitative and qualitative changes in the diet. The former dietary changes include shifts in the structure of the diet towards a higher energy density diet with a greater ratio of fat and added sugars to foods, greater saturated fat intake (mainly from animal sources), reduced intakes of complex carbohydrates and dietary fibre, and reduced fruit and vegetable intake (7). These dietary changes are complemented by lifestyle changes that reflect reduced physical activity at work and during leisure time (7). At the same time, however, poor countries continue to face food shortages and nutrient inadequacies.

Diets evolve over time, being influenced by many factors and complex interactions. Factors, patterns, individual preferences and habits, cultural traditions, as well as geographical, environmental, social and economic
