Programming Environments for High-level Scientific Problem Solving Pat W. Gaffney,Elias N. Houstis,1992 Programming environments as the name suggests are intended to provide a unified extensive range of capabilities for a person wishing to solve a problem using a computer In this particular proceedings volume the problem considered is a high level scientific computation In other words a scientific problem whose solution usually requires sophisticated computing techniques and a large allocation of computing resources   Enhancing Problem Solving by Alleviating Functional Fixedness Using Virtual Environments Petra Brnova,2013 Functional fixedness is an issue in problem solving which prevents people from generating solutions to problems based on their prior familiarity with particular solution principle or typical function of objects As such functional fixedness may impede problem solving A number of studies have been conducted to alleviate functional fixedness but their results were inconclusive or not replicated Of the approaches investigated on method albeit unpractical appeared to be most likely effective in alleviating the effects of functional fixedness This method involved allowing participants a physical contact with objects Today computer technologies such as virtual environments VEs are increasingly being used for a variety of training applications VEs which are computer generated 3 D simulations of real environment allow participants to freely interact with virtual objects Moreover these types of environments do not pose limitations that the real world environment does As such VEs warrant an investigation of their potential use as tools for improving problem solving To this date there has not been an empirical research on the use of non immersive desktop VEs for improving problem solving in functional fixedness scenarios The purpose of the present study was to examine effects of different stimuli environments virtual real and photo on problem solving performance The study focused on replicating findings in a real environment and extending such findings to a virtual environment Specifically efficacy of the desktop VE as a digital tool for enhancing problem solving by alleviating functional fixedness was examined across training and transfer settings In the current study 90 undergraduate and graduate students of a local university were randomly assigned to one of three problem solving environment conditions photo real or virtual Participants were then asked to solve two of Duncker s classic problems the Candle and the Pliers problems within a 15 minute time limit The study utilized the between subjects repeated measures design The independent variable had three levels which were the photo real and virtual problem solving environment One primary and two secondary dependent variables were the repeated measures of performance on the training problem Candle problem and the transfer problem Pliers problem It was expected that in general real and virtual objects interactions will have a positive effect on problem solving performance as measured by successful problem solution and number of solutions The study produced mixed results with significantly better problem solving performance observed for the participants in the real objects manipulation ROM condition and the virtual objects manipulation VOM condition on the transfer problem These results as well as results of secondary analyses limitations and directions for future research are discussed   Management John R.
