

Ian P. Henry The Politics of Leisure Policy, Macmillan / Palgrave 2001 2nd edition

Introduction

Chapter 1: The Politics of Leisure and Policy

At the beginning of the 1960s, following the post-war period of major growth, Daniel Bell (1960) felt able to declare "the end of ideology", by which he referred to the political consensus organised around social democratic politics and institutions. The battle between the political left and right appeared to Bell and many others to have become obsolete. Three decades later, Fukuyama (1990) was asking whether we were at "the end of history", by which he also meant to signal the end of political debate between left and right but this time with consensus organised around a neo-liberal political paradigm. The mistaken nature of Bell's claims (the publishing of his book was followed by the rapid politicisation of the public sphere, particularly in the UK, with the resurgence of a radical left and the emergence of Thatcherism) should serve to warn us of the dangers of assuming the permanence of another paradigm.

In Britain in the closing years of the century, a New Labour government had been elected and was searching desperately for the means with which to define its political position and to differentiate itself in ideological and policy terms from the political opposition and from its 'socialist' past. The struggle for political definition and legitimacy across the closing decades of the century provides the context for the central theme of this book which is to explain the emergence, shaping and implications of leisure policy at the beginning of the new millennium.

A brief sketch of the emergence and development of leisure studies as an academic field might portray it in terms of four broad waves of theory. The first in the 1970s, is what might be seen as an emerging pluralist orthodoxy, perhaps most articulately argued by Ken Roberts (1978). The second wave, evident in the 1980s, provided a series of radical critiques of the pluralist account, focusing on social divisions and inequalities in structural terms, with neo-Weberian accounts (Coalter, with Duffield, & Long, 1987), neo-Marxist accounts (Clarke & Critcher, 1985; Hargreaves, 1986), feminist accounts (Deem, 1986; Green, Hebron, & Woodward, 1990; Wimbush & Talbot, 1988), and socialist policy programmes (Whannel, 1983) challenging that pluralist orthodoxy. In the 1990s a third wave in leisure studies emerges associated with the in-roads which post-modernism has made into social theory. While 'mainstream' social theorists began to turn their attention seriously to culture, leisure and lifestyle (Baudrillard, 1988; Lash & Urry, 1994; Urry, 1990), some leisure theorists actively embraced destructured and relativised post-modern perspectives (Rojek, 1994) which contrasted with the structured certainties of the radical critiques of the previous decade. Alongside, and in part as a reaction to, post-modern perspectives, a fourth wave is discernible. Holistic approaches, theoretical traditions which sought to explain the increasingly
