 - generating research- The useful theory should be logical and testable. It should be able to stimulate and guide further research. generate two different kinds of research: Descriptive research and Hypothesis testing.
 - Falsifiability- doesn't mean that theory should be disapproveable, but that it should be designed in a way so that it can be proved or disapproved at any time.
 - Organizing data- be able to organize data that are not incompatible with each other. A useful theory organizes data in some meaningful way.
 - Guides Action- ability to guide the practitioner over the rough courses of day-to-day problems.
 - Internal Consistency- Components are logically compatible. A good theory will use concepts and terms that have been clearly and operationally defined.
