MAKING POSTWAR LANDSCAPES VISIBLE

Living Green in Suburban and Urban Landscapes in Southern California

David Miller

In the early to mid-1950s, California was the nation's most rapidly growing state. The postwar boom was fueled by a combination of factors: the GI Bill, the baby boom, and the migration of people from the Northeast and Midwest to the West. This led to a massive increase in the number of people living in California, particularly in the Los Angeles basin and the San Diego area.

As the population grew, the demand for housing and infrastructure increased. This led to the construction of large-scale residential developments, many of which were designed by modernist landscape architects. These architects sought to create a new type of suburban landscape, one that was more integrated with nature and more aesthetically pleasing than the traditional suburban model.

One of the key figures in this movement was the architect and landscape architect Charles Wright. Wright's work focused on creating a sense of community and connection to the land. He designed a number of large-scale residential developments, including the University City area in San Diego and the University City area in Los Angeles.

Wright's work was characterized by its emphasis on natural materials and its integration of modernist design principles with traditional landscape architecture. His work has had a lasting impact on the way we think about and design our outdoor spaces.
