Abstract This article examines the relationship between business ethics and the business case for sustainability. It argues that the business case for sustainability is a necessary but not sufficient condition for business ethics.

Keywords Business ethics · Business case for sustainability · Sustainability · Business ethics and the business case for sustainability

Business ethics and the business case for sustainability are two of the most prominent topics in business ethics research today.

Business ethics is the study of moral principles and values that govern the behavior of individuals and organizations in the business world.

The business case for sustainability is the argument that sustainable business practices are profitable and competitive in the long run.

Both business ethics and the business case for sustainability are important to the success of a business.

Business ethics helps to build trust and loyalty among customers and employees, while the business case for sustainability helps to attract investment and secure the future of the business.

However, there is a tension between business ethics and the business case for sustainability. Business ethics often requires actions that are not in the immediate financial interest of the business.

For example, a business may be required to pay higher wages or provide better benefits than its competitors in order to attract and retain top talent.

Such actions may be ethically sound, but they may also be costly and reduce the business's short-term profitability.

On the other hand, the business case for sustainability often encourages actions that are profitable but may be ethically questionable.

For example, a business may be tempted to cut corners on safety or environmental standards in order to reduce costs and increase profits.

Such actions may be profitable in the short run, but they may also be harmful to the business in the long run.

Therefore, it is important to understand the relationship between business ethics and the business case for sustainability in order to make informed decisions about the future of the business.
