

Integrating Dynamic Interactionism Into the Brain–Stress–Psychopathology Relationship

Public Significance Statement

Much research has examined associations between brain structure or function and psychopathology. However, less research has examined dynamic interactional models of the brain–stress–psychopathology relationship. In this paper, drawing on a long history of personality–stress–psychopathology research, we selectively review clinical neuroscience evidence regarding different models of the brain–stress–psychopathology relationship and propose a dynamic-interactionist perspective of this relationship.

Abstract

Research into the brain bases of mental health has flourished in the last few decades and has provided important insights into associations between brain function or structure and psychopathology. Research to date has largely adopted a precursor or predisposition assumption about the relationship between the brain and psychopathology; that is, that altered brain structure or function (BSoF) precedes and causes psychopathology such that sufficiently altered BSoF will lead to a psychological disorder. However, close to 60 years of research into the psychological bases of psychopathology suggests the relationship between individual traits, the environment (i.e., stress), and psychopathology is dynamic, interactional, and complex. As such, drawing on the substantial literature examining dynamic interactional relationships between personality traits, stress, and psychopathology, the aim of this review is to highlight clinical neuroscience research examining the brain–stress–psychopathology relationship from a dynamic interactionist perspective. In particular, we consider (a) how brain structure/function may lead to increased stress, (b) how stress may alter brain structure/function, (c) how brain structure/function may interact with (i.e., moderate) the effects of stress on psychopathology, (d) how psychopathology may alter brain structure/function, (e) how brain structure/function may not just lead to psychopathology but also influence the course and severity of psychopathology as well as treatment prognosis, and (f) how brain structure/function may represent a state- versus trait-marker of psychopathology. Such dynamic-interactionist perspectives may lead to a better understanding of the brain–stress–psychopathology relationship in the future.

In the last 60 years, there has been a substantial amount of research into the role of individual biopsychosocial differences in mental health and how these manifest in neural substrates. Research has attempted to delineate the complex relationships between individual traits, the environment, and psychopathology. In particular, the field
