

A SIMPLE, RAPID PROCEDURE FOR THE LABORATORY DIAGNOSIS OF EARLY PREGNANCY

By HERBERT B. FORDMAN, Ph.D., and MARION E. LAYMAN, M.D., PENSACOLA, FL.

(From the Department of Physiology, University of Pennsylvania—Fisk the Cooperation of the Department of Obstetrics, University Hospital, Medical School)

AN EXAMINATION of the work of Lewis and Rosenzweig,¹ Brodie and Stewart,² Edwards,³ and Brailer⁴ would hardly fail to convince one that the test for pregnancy described by Zondek and Aschheim⁵ is of great practical value. Yet this test, admirable though it is, has some distinct disadvantages, one of which may make it impractical in a laboratory or hospital not closely affiliated with some university or institute. To perform the Zondek-Aschheim test it is essential to be in a position to command a ready supply of immature mice weighing from six to eight grams. If a large breeding colony of mice is not readily available, some difficulty might be encountered in procuring suitable animals at the time a test was desired. Moreover, even if one had at hand enough of the immature mice to cover the calculated requirements for a given week, and, for some reason or other the number of samples submitted fell below expectations, the rescued animals would soon mature beyond their usefulness, so that another group of the immature animals would have to be gotten.

It is believed that the procedure to be outlined here obviates this difficulty as well as some others inherent in the Zondek-Aschheim procedure. Our method rests upon three fundamental facts:

1. The urine of an intact, unmated female rabbit contains neither corpus luteum nor corpus hemorrhagicum, inasmuch as the rabbit does not ovulate spontaneously, but only after mating.
2. The urine of pregnant women contains one substance, or substance, which exerts in their bodies effects the anterior lobe of the pituitary.
3. The ovary of the rabbit quickly responds to the injection of these substances by the formation of corpus luteum or corpus hemorrhagicum.

The first fact has long been known, and has been used to advantage in the study of the reproductive activities of the rabbit.⁶ The second fact, namely, that the urine of pregnant women contains the biologically active substance, was reported by Zondek and Aschheim, and is utilized by them in their test for pregnancy. That the ovary of the rabbit would respond promptly to the injection of urine from pregnant women was noted in some studies on the mechanism of ovulation in the rabbit,⁷⁻⁹ and confirmed by Jansz¹⁰ and by Hill and Purkin.¹¹

Rabbit pregnancy test method

Day 1 and Day 2 - urine injection

tested urine (10 ml, pH 7.4)
injected into the female rabbit's ear vein

Day 3 - results -
evaluation of changes in rabbit ovaries:

positive test result (pregnancy) -
blood vesicles and fresh corpus luteum

negative test result (no pregnancy) -
no characteristic changes in the ovaries

The rabbit could be "used"
for a test every three weeks, but no more than three times.
