TWO PHILOSOPHICAL PROBLEMS IN THE STUDY OF HAPPINESS

(Received 1 February, 2000; Accepted 1 March, 2000)

ABSTRACT. In this paper two philosophical issues are discussed that hold special interest for empirical researchers studying happiness. The first issue concerns the question of how the psychological notion(s) of happiness invoked in empirical research relates to those traditionally employed by philosophers. The second concerns the question of how we ought to conceive of happiness, understood as a purely psychological phenomenon. With respect to the first, I argue that 'happiness', as used in the philosophical literature, has three importantly different senses that are often confused. Empirical research on happiness concerns only one of these senses, and serious misunderstandings about the significance of empirical results can arise from such confusion. I then argue that the second question is indeed philosophical and that, in order to understand the nature of (what I call) psychological happiness, we need first to determine what a theory of happiness is supposed to do: what are our theoretical and practical interests in the notion of happiness? I sketch an example of how such an inquiry might proceed, and argue that this approach can shed more light on the nature and significance of happiness (and related mental states) than traditional philosophical methods.

KEY WORDS: happiness, philosophy, well-being, methodology.

I. INTRODUCTION

It is often said that Socrates posed the defining question of ethics: How should I live?¹ Some 2400 years of subsequent philosophical inquiry into this matter has yielded few real answers, perhaps none. Thus an undergraduate course in ethics tends to be mostly a lesson in what we don't know about how to live: the good life is probably not lived in accordance with Mill's principle of utility; it is only dubiously guided by Kant's categorical imperative; and for all its appeal Aristotle's injunction to fulfill the human telos suffers from the fact that there isn't any such thing.² Moreover, the focus is almost always on the purely moral dimensions of the good life, as if the purpose of ethical inquiry is simply to produce a handbook for aspiring saints. But the good life has other dimensions, notably the prudential (i.e., that concerned with well-being). One might have thought that among the central aspects of Socrates' question would be: What manner of living will make me happiest? Yet about this and related questions modern philosophers have had little of significance to say.
