

Problem-Solution pattern

The Problem-Solution pattern is one of the most important organizational structures in scientific and engineering texts, but is also found in newspaper and magazine articles. The problem-solution pattern reflects a form of critical thinking that tends to be more argumentative and evaluative. You may find this pattern useful in writing introductions, research reports, proposals, and essay answers to examination questions. In its simplest form, the Problem-Solution pattern consists of two parts: a problem and a solution. However, most problem-solution texts involve four steps.

SITUATION

The first sentence in a paragraph, often referred to as the Situation, provides background information and the setting for the problem. In this step, the writer attempts to orient the reader by showing the importance or relevance of the current situation to the reader's world. The words below are frequently used to emphasize the relevance of the topic:

major, important, popular, common, and many

PROBLEM

The second or topic sentence states the problem. In science texts, the problem is commonly signaled using the following types of words:

contrast (However, despite, unfortunately, although, but),
negative connotation (limited, few, little, no, not, none), synonyms for "problem" (danger, drawback, disadvantage, weakness, need, shortcoming, obstacle).

Sometimes, the present situation may be presented as the problem, or these first two steps can even be presented in reverse order. Describing a problem also entails commenting on the history, possible causes and effects of the problem, the limitations of any current/previous solutions, as well as the criteria for a good solution.

SOLUTION

Once the reader understands the importance-relevance of this topic and the problems arising from it, the next step introduces a solution to the problem. This step is often signaled using the words below:

Nouns (solution, answer, approach, strategy, improvement) verbs (solve, address a problem, work out and develop) causative connectors (therefore, as a result, thus).

EVALUATION

When presented with a possible solution, readers naturally wonder whether this solution is effective in light of the criteria described in the problem step. Therefore, the final step should evaluate the solution. If the evaluation is negative (i.e., the solution is ineffective), then your reader will expect an explanation as to why it will not work. Alternatively, a positive evaluation supports a successful solution, and the positive features of the solution would be signaled by positive language:

Nouns (benefit or advantage) verbs (provide, offer, enable, allow) Adjectives (effective, efficient, reliable, safe, useful)
