

CHM 200- Experiment I

Acid Base Titration

Volumetric analysis

Titration is a quantitative accurate analytical technique used to determine accurately the unknown concentration of a substance. A titration is carried out by addition of a known volume of a substance (known concentration) called titrant to another substance of known volume but unknown concentration.

During a TITRATION increments of a reagent solution of known concentration (titrant) are added to the solution of unknown concentration (analyte) until their reaction is complete (equivalence point). The titrant is a standard solution and is delivered from a buret. The titration is carried out to determine the concentration of the analyte as accurately as possible. The reaction used in a titration needs to meet the following conditions for a good titration:
