THE COMBINED JOINT TASK FORCES CONCEPT

The concept of Combined Joint Task Forces (CJT F) provides flexible and efficient means to enable the Alliance to generate forces at short notice, providing rapidly deployable, multi-national, multi-service task forces with appropriate command and control arrangements.

A CJT F is a deployable multinational, multiservice task force generated and tailored primarily, but not exclusively, for military operations not involving the defence of the Alliance territory, such as humanitarian relief and peacekeeping.

The wide variety of possible uses of CJT Fs, potentially in very different circumstances, places considerable demands on the arrangements for commanding and controlling such operations. The role of the headquarters for a CJT F is therefore crucial. CJT F headquarters "nuclei" or core staffs are being established on a permanent basis within selected "parent" headquarters of the NATO military command structure. Together with "augmentation" modules and "support" modules generated for the purposes of a specific operation they will form a headquarters to command a CJT F structured to meet the requirements of the operation in question.

The concept was launched in late 1993 and endorsed at the Brussels Summit of January 1994. On that occasion, Alliance Heads of State and Government directed that the further development of the concept should also reflect their readiness to make NATO assets available, on the basis of case-by-case decisions by the North Atlantic Council, for operations led by the Western European Union (WEU) thereby supporting the building of the European Security Defence Identity. In addition, they linked the development of the CJT F concept to practical political-military cooperation with non-NATO nations.

The respective meetings of Alliance Foreign and Defence Ministers in Berlin and Brussels in June 1996 approved an overall political-military framework for the CJT F concept. The first phase of military implementation established the viability of the concept through staff work and trials involving three CJT F "parent" headquarters. The second phase was devoted to a thorough assessment of:

- a. the Alliance's capability to deploy small- and large-scale, land- and sea-based CJT F headquarters; and
- b. any need to nominate additional CJT F "parent" headquarters.

Based on this assessment, final preparations for the third and final phase of implementation have commenced. The lessons learned from the NATO-led operations in and around the former Yugoslavia are being taken fully into account throughout the CJT F implementation process.
