Abstract

The paper examines Awolowo's theory of mental magnitude and how it can contribute to the debate on the achievement of good governance in Nigeria. The theory harps on a person's ability to subvert the human desires that crave selfish interest and crass materialism. Basically, it is about good governance which is defined in terms of transparency, accountability, social justice, fairness, equity and selflessness. It says that leaders engage in corrupt practices and selfish acts because they lack complete education, which Awolowo links with the development of mind, body and brain, an embodiment of mental magnitude. It is the belief that leaders need to tame their appetite and emotion, and embrace discipline as a value in order to achieve effective governance and development in society.

Keywords: mental magnitude, leadership, corruption, self-discipline, good governance.

1. Introduction

The greatest challenge that faces Nigeria today is that of good governance, though this may not be a peculiar problem to Nigeria as some countries in the Middle East, Asia and Africa are currently facing political storming sessions. For Nigeria, there is something that makes its problems unique. In spite of the abundance in both material and human resources, Nigeria remains one of the poorest countries in the world, best illustrated by its institutional and structural decay and represented by high level of poverty, diseases, ignorance and superstition. Nigeria is a typical example of a country with this problem of poverty, ignorance, disease and superstition. At present it ranks second in the UNDP Low Human Development index (2007/2008) in spite of the fact that it is currently occupying the 8th position among the countries producing oil in the world. Thus, in the country poverty has virtually become a culture, while a handful of elites are living in affluence. Indeed, Trask (2004, p. 10) captures the situation when he says that those leaders entrusted with the resources of their countries prefer to enrich themselves using political means, thereby increase their wealth. Here it is right to conclude that self-interest remains stronger, in the mind of Nigerian leaders (politicians), than the need to meet the basic needs of the citizens. It is this kind of experience that informs Nyerere's (2009) conclusion that bad government is not generally interested in eradicating poverty. On this note, Plato is justified to have observed that one of the evils of political life is the material greed of politicians. Awolowo reaches the same conclusion in his analysis of leadership and good governance in Nigeria. This paper examines Awolowo's theory of mental magnitude and its connection with the issue of leadership and good governance in Nigeria and argues that to achieve good governance Nigerian leaders and the citizens alike, must tame their appetite and embrace discipline as a value now that the country is struggling to attract international business partners to Nigeria.

2. Awolowo's Theory of Mental Magnitude and the Human Nature.

Awolowo identifies corruption and selfishness as the major factors that have brought a decline to Nigerians' living condition; incidentally, this condition has recently brought about political instability in the country.
