On the role of metaphors in COVID-related political communication: an examination of Jacinda Ardern's metaphorical language in managing the health crisis

Abstract: In comparison to many other countries across the world, New Zealand stands out as a positive example of successfully dealing with the COVID-19 pandemic during its first outbreak. A pivotal role in this has been attributed to Jacinda Ardern, New Zealand's prime minister, who has been praised for her effective communication throughout the crisis and her capacity to connect empathetically to the people. The present study explores Ardern's crisis discourse by focusing on her use of metaphors to talk about COVID-19, its transmission, and the measures adopted by the New Zealand government to contain its spread. This analysis, which adopts the framework of Critical Metaphor Theory, aims at disclosing which metaphors were used by Jacinda Ardern and whether there is anything exceptional in these metaphors and their usage that could relate to Ardern's successful management of the health crisis in its initial phase. The data consists of eight post-Cabinet press conferences given by Ardern from the beginning of the outbreak at the end of February 2020 to the day when she declared that community transmission was over (27 April 2020).

1 Introduction

The outbreak of the infectious disease COVID-19 has posed a number of challenges across the world starting from its initial detection in January 2020. Since then, the entire world has mobilized and called upon the professional expertise of doctors, virologists, and epidemiologists in order to identify the most effective means and measures to cope with and overcome what had quickly turned into a pandemic. Relying on this knowledge, many legislators and politicians introduced policies that brought about new norms of social and individual behavior (from social distancing to hygiene measures) and, more generally, new ways of life that (temporarily) transformed one's home into the "safest" retreat while conflating the professional and private spatial dimensions.

Managing such a global crisis has not been an easy task for anyone involved, but some among the people directly in charge of the situation seem to have reacted more effectively. Jacinda Ardern, New Zealand's former prime minister, stands out as a positive example and one that has been acclaimed internationally at the beginning of the health crisis. As a political leader, she has been considered exceptional in her initial approach to the health emergency in New Zealand (NZ). Previous research has identified that Ardern has been able to combine strong and decisive action<sup>1</sup> with an empathetic and caring attitude (see Degani 2022; Jamieson 2020; McGuire et al. 2020; Wilson 2020), which might explain part of her impact on and appreciation by NZ citizens. New Zealanders' very 1 To provide a brief illustration of Ardern's "strong" approach, one can consider that the first substantial restrictions (e.g. people have to work from home, gatherings of more than 10 people are prohibited, public venues are closed, interregional travel is highly limited) were introduced on 23 March 2020, with about 50 confirmed cases of infection in NZ. For an outline of the strict measures adopted by the NZ government from 30 January 2020 to 9 June 2020 consult Jamieson (2020: 599–600).
