VOL. No. 1

JULY 14, 2016

Key reasons to extract inactive data from Lotus Notes applications

The majority of accumulated data in Notes/Domino databases is inactive. This data is not frequently used, but still needs to be preserved for business or compliance reasons.

43%

of organizations are looking to preserve Notes documents outside of IBM Domino (whether migrating or not).

System performance

By off-loading old data from applications that are actively running, you can boost the application performance. And by decommissioning legacy Lotus Notes applications (those that are no longer used in day-to-day operations), you will keep your entire Domino infrastructure lean and efficient.

Costs

Extracting inactive data from Lotus Notes saves on costs associated with hardware, licenses and effort. You can consolidate Domino servers and applications, speed up the backup process and reduce the overall operating costs.

Risks

If inactive data resides on a legacy platform, or an unsupported application, it leads to a high risk of non-compliance. The risk grows as systems age. The risk also grows as Notes developers and Domino administrators leave the company. Therefore, inactive data should be extracted and archived before it becomes inaccessible.

Data retention

Data retention periods cannot be determined by your application or platform lifespan. For long-term archiving, Notes data should be detached from the original application, and saved in a format that a business person will be able to use.

Data migration

When undertaking a platform migration or application modernization project, it is much easier to migrate only the active data, instead of both active and historical data. You can reduce migration costs and risks of failure substantially by off-loading historical data from Domino databases on a regular basis.
