Spiegler, CALIFORNIA UNIV BERKELEY SEA WATER CONVERSION LAB., 1971 Experiments were performed to assess the value of various commercial and specially prepared membranes as separators in batteries containing electrolytes dissolved in propylene carbonate PC Specifically these membranes should prevent self discharge of lithium copper halide cells Since literature data suggest that self discharge is caused by transport of anionic copper complexes to the lithium electrode the separators selected were primarily cation exchange membranes which are known to exclude anions in aqueous solutions Selective permeability for anions was tested by a variety of electrolyte diffusion interdiffusion and transport number measurements It was established that most commercial cation exchange membranes have high resistances in PC but three membranes with resistances less than 250 ohms sq cm in 0.50 M LiClO₄ PC at 25 C were found viz C 322 American Machine and Foundry Co Stamford Conn 117 ohm sq cm UM 05 Amicon Corp Lexington Mass 230 ohm sq cm and 7930 Porous Glass Corning Glass Works Corning N Y 75 ohms sq cm In order to combine the advantages of cation selectivity with low resistance laminated membranes consisting of thin layers of phenolsulfonic acid formaldehyde cation exchange membranes on porous inert supports were prepared and tested The data indicate that anion barrier membranes of low resistance can be prepared by further developing this method Author Research and Development Progress Report United States.
