

Grenzprobleme of Phenomenology: Metaphysics

Steven Crowell

In approaching the topic of this volume – “horizons” of phenomenology – my first thought was simply to list the contents of Husserliana volume 42, Grenzprobleme der Phänomenologie. In homage to the great Alan Ginsburg’s dictum – “first thought, best thought” – I provide the short list of those contents here (Husserl, 2014, v–xvii):

1. Phenomenology of the unconscious and the limit-problems of birth, sleep, and death
2. Phenomenology of the Instincts
3. Metaphysics: Monadology, teleology, and philosophical theology
4. Reflections on Ethics

My second thought was to focus on the problems or open questions that have loomed large in my own phenomenological work, a list that partially overlaps with Husserl’s:

1. Phenomenology of reason
2. Ontological pluralism and metaphysics
3. Phenomenology of thinking
4. Second-person phenomenology

But a list is not an essay, and so I will limit myself to a question that arises in reflecting on the relation between phenomenology and metaphysics. Among the various topics mentioned in Grenzprobleme under “metaphysics,” I will mostly leave teleology and theology aside and will focus on monadology – more specifically, on how to understand monadology in light of the relation between givenness and being established by the transcendental reduction.

The editor of Husserliana 42, Rochus Sowa, distinguishes, within the general heading of Grenzprobleme, between “margin” or “limit” problems (Randprobleme)
