Applying the language of reasoning

Key terms

Conclusions, reasons, claims, premises, independent reasons, combined reasons

So far we have learned that....

Arguments are set of statements containing reasons supporting a conclusion.

Conclusions are the primary claims of arguments; the claims we are trying to get others accept.

Reasons are the supporting claims. They support the conclusions.

So, both conclusions and reasons are types of claims.

Now, let us identify reasons in arguments and understand the different ways they might support the conclusions.

Reasons are claims that intend to support the conclusions.

These claims are also called PREMISES

A premise is simply any claim to put forward as support for the conclusions

It is very likely that in your previous assignments when you were asked to find conclusions in arguments, you also located the reasons (also called premises) that supported the conclusions. Hence, finding conclusions and reasons in arguments are not totally separated tasks; we might say you need to recognize one of them to locate the other.

The task of identifying premises is to find reasons that the author is giving us to convince us that his conclusions is true (valid, congruent, well sound, well grounded, reliable, etc.).

Finding conclusions, reasons and other argument elements require a careful and generous reading of what the author is saying. Here we will bring some tips to do this more quickly and effectively

Improving your reading speed and reading comprehension skills will definitely sharp up your critical thinking since you will spend less time in

Remember that arguments can appear in speeches and the time for processing is significantly shorter.
