

The principal programming paradigms

"More is not better (or worse) than less, just different."

Explanations

See "Concepts, Techniques, and Models of Computer Programming".

The chart classifies programming paradigms according to their kernel languages (the small core language in which all the paradigm's abstractions can be defined). Kernel languages are ordered according to the creative extension principle: a new concept is added when it cannot be modeled with only local transformations. Two languages that implement the same paradigm can nevertheless have very different "flavors" for the programmer, because they make different choices about what programming techniques and styles to facilitate.

When a language is mentioned under a paradigm, it means that part of the language is modeled by its designers to support the paradigm without introducing ideas from other paradigms. It does not mean that there is a perfect fit between the language and the paradigm. It is not enough that libraries have been written in the language to support the paradigm. The language's kernel language should support the paradigm. When there is a family of related languages, usually only one member of the family is mentioned to avoid clutter. The absence of a language does not imply any kind of value judgment.

None is the ability to remember information, or more precisely, to store a sequence of values in time. An expressive power is strongly influenced by the paradigm that contains it. We distinguish four levels of expressiveness, which allow to whether the state is assumed or named, deterministic or nondeterministic, and sequential or concurrent. The least expressive is functional programming (assumed state, e.g. IOs and monads assumed, deterministic, and sequential). Adding concurrency gives declarative concurrent programming (e.g. synchronically assumed, deterministic, and concurrent). Adding nondeterminism choice gives concurrent logic programming (relax state choice, assumed, nondeterministic, and concurrent). Adding ports or cells, respectively, gives message passing in shared state (both are named, nondeterministic, and concurrent). Nondeterminism is important for real-world interaction (e.g. client/server). Named state is important for modularity.

Also orthogonal to the chart are typing, aspects, and domain-specificity. Typing is not completely orthogonal, if the same effect on expressiveness. Aspects should be completely orthogonal, since they are just a program's specification. A domain-specific language should be definitely in one paradigm except when the domain needs a particular concept.

Multi-programming is another way to increase the expressiveness of a language. The same covers many different approaches, from higher-order programming (static extensibility (e.g. macros) in higher-order programming combined with contracts support (e.g. meta-object protocols and generics), to full-fledged tinkering with the kernel language (introspection and reflection). Syntactic extensibility and kernel language tinkering in particular are orthogonal to this chart. Some languages, such as Scheme, are flexible enough to implement many paradigms in almost native fashion. The flexibility is not shown in the chart.
