What is Apache Web Server?

Apache HTTP Server is a free and open-source web server that delivers web content through the internet. It is commonly referred to as Apache and after development, it quickly became the most popular HTTP client on the web. It's widely thought that Apache gets its name from its development history and process of improvement through applied patches and modules but that was corrected back in `chicconfg httpd` on 2000. It was revealed that the name originated from the respect of the Native American tribe for its resiliency and durability.

Now, before we get too in-depth on Apache, we should first go over what a web application is and the standard architecture usually found in web apps.

Working of Apache

Apache is not any physical server, it is software that executes on the server. However, we define it as a web server. Its objective is to build a connection among the website visitor browsers (Safari, Google Chrome, Firefox, etc.) and the server. Apache can be defined as cross-platform software, so it can work on Windows servers and UNIX.

Apache web server . port number is 80

Install and Configure Apache HTTP Server in Red Hat Enterprise

Linux

yum install httpd
chicconfg httpd on system
config-services service
httpd start
```
