Abstract

Halftone images are usually used in facsimile and halftone image steganography can be used for facsimile channel. In recent years, real-time image processing becomes more and more important. In this paper, an efficient block-based steganographic method for halftone images is proposed. This method is based on optimal dispersion degree (DD), which can measure the complexity of the region texture. To reduce the visual distortion, the blocks with complex texture can be selected as carriers according to the dispersion degree. Finally, the secret messages are embedded by flipping the pixels that can minimize the changes of texture structure. The experiments demonstrate that the proposed scheme maintains a good image visual quality and realizes acceptable statistical security with high capacity.

1 Introduction

Steganography is a practice of covert communication using hiding messages. With the development of digital multimedia, digital image has become an important carrier for covert communication. In recent years, many steganographic schemes have been proposed for digital images [6, 8, 11, 16, 21, 27]. In recent years, many steganography schemes in grayscale image have been proposed. Qin et al. [24] proposed a prediction-based reversible steganographic scheme based on image inpainting. By employing the adaptive strategy for choosing reference pixels and the inpainting predictor, they could achieve great embedding rate and visual quality. Qin et al. [23] provided a joint data-hiding and compression scheme by employing side match vector quantization (SMVQ) and image inpainting to achieve high steganographic performance. Compared to grayscale images, binary images have their unique binary properties, so steganography in binary image is completely different from in grayscale images. Halftone image is a special kind of binary image, which simulates grayscale using scattered black and Bas2011 white points. For the small storage space and the similar visual performance as grayscale images, halftone images can be used in facsimile.

For the purpose of imperceptibility for halftone images, many state-of-the-art embedding methods have been proposed [13–15, 22]. In [22], the secret messages are embedded with phase shifting. Guo and Tsai [14] use a trained quality-noise look-up table and optimized multipliers to control the additive noise strength. To simulate the noise, the secret messages can be embedded with good visual quality. The schemes above need to use original grayscale images as reference images, but the original grayscale images are not provided in common scenarios. Another category of halftone image steganographic methods embeds messages in generated halftone images without the original grayscale images. Fu and Au proposed a block-based method (denoted as DHSPT) where pseudo-randomly pixels are selected in the halftone image with intensity and connection selection [13]. Guo and Zhang [15] proposed a block-based method that employs a Grouping
