

The Anatomy of Agenda-Setting Research

by Everett M. Rogers, University of New Mexico, James W. Dearing, Michigan State University, and Dorine Bregman, Institut d'Etudes Politiques de Paris

Intellectual histories are complex because they represent the culmination of many instances of personal and impersonal influence. For example, Walter Lippmann wrote Public Opinion in 1922, based on his World War I experiences in propaganda and military intelligence, because of the prompting of his Harvard professor, Graham Wallas. Almost 50 years later, Maxwell McCombs walked into the UCLA Bookstore and bought a copy of Bernard Cohen's (1963) The Press and Foreign Policy.<sup>3</sup> In both cases, social influence played an important role in determining what each scholar would do, and the work for which both of them would be remembered.

Before buying Cohen's (1963) book, McCombs had been sitting with his UCLA faculty colleagues in a bar in Los Angeles. He called their attention to that day's front page of the Los Angeles Times. The paper reported three major news items, one of which, the resignation of the director of the Los Angeles War on Poverty programs, was highlighted. McCombs and his colleagues discussed possible reasons why one news item was headlined over the others, and speculated about the consequences of front-page headlines for readers. McCombs's next step was to the UCLA bookstore and Cohen's (1963) book. Soon he was on his way to Chapel Hill and his classic study of agenda setting with Donald Shaw (McCombs & Shaw, 1972).

<sup>3</sup> McCombs had first encountered Lippmann's (1922) book, and Cohen's (1963), a few years previously, while doing assigned reading for a doctoral course on communication theory taught by Wilbur Schramm at Stanford University. A detailed history of how Maxwell McCombs and Donald Shaw came to carry out their agenda-setting study during the 1968 presidential election is provided by Tankard (1990, pp. 278-286).
