

OCTAVIA HILL

It is moving, after reading Miss Moberly Hill's account of Octavia Hill's crowded career of struggle and triumph—the battles fought on their property, the campaign to help the poor without pauperization, the founding of the Charity Organisation Society, the battle for Open Spaces resulting in the establishment of the Commons Preservation Society and finally of the National Trust—we remember that in 1825, at the age of fourteen, she wrote (writing so despairingly): "Do you think I ever shall be able to do anything really useful?"

The biographer has admirably succeeded in presenting a living portrait—group of Octavia, her family and her friends. Her father and mother, her two sisters, her mother's father, Dr. Southwood Smith, William and Mary Weston, Frederick Denison Maurice and the Christian Association, the George Washington, and most powerful of all, John Ruskin—these were the moulding influences of Octavia's youth and young womanhood. Then she herself became an influence, and was for the rest of her life a figure revered and loved by thousands in every class of society and walks of life.

SIR REGINALD HOWE (President of The National Federation of Housing Societies) says in his Foreword:

"It is high time and the right time for the full story of the life of Octavia Hill to be published. After long association with housing societies in this country, I am fully convinced that the best of all that is now being done for the better housing of the poor has had for its origin and inspiration the life work of this remarkable Englishwoman.

Octavia Hill was completely unselfish and had indomitable courage both physical and moral. She walked bravely and unswervingly in "Lancet," shocked by the public, and was never deterred by failure. ("It is no failure," she says, "that success are built.")

"The story of Octavia Hill should be known in the young generation of every school and should be thoughtfully studied by those who believe that in the progress of our country the best of the industrial revolution is to be the national responsibility houses."
