Abstract Is it possible to talk about God without either misrepresentation or failing to assert anything of significance? The article begins by reviewing how, in attempting to answer this question, traditional theories of religious language have failed to sidestep both potential pitfalls adequately. After arguing that recently developed theories of metaphor seem better able to shed light on the nature of religious language, it considers the claim that huge areas of our language and, consequently, of our experience are shaped by metaphors. Finally, it considers some of the more significant implications of this claim for our understanding of both religious language and religious experience.

Keywords Metaphor · Religious language · God · Religious experience

Is it possible to talk about God¹ without either misrepresentation or failing to assert anything of significance? In an attempt to answer this question, I begin by reviewing how traditional theories of religious language have failed to sidestep both potential pitfalls adequately. I then turn to recent developments in the theory of metaphor developments that seem better able to explain how speakers are capable of referring to God successfully without having to misrepresent the divine.

Before proceeding, however, some clarification of the term “religious language” is required. “Religious language,” as employed by religious scholars in the everyday sense, refers to the written and spoken language typically used by religious believers

¹Rather than exploring the ways in which different conceptions of God might influence thought about religious language, I presuppose a particular view of God—that view which is dominant within Semitic monotheism—and consider religious language as it is employed within the context of belief in that God.
