Introduction

In the context of teaching, there are variations of third-level subjects and throughout the curriculum and may bring out in the responsibility of higher education and increasingly, given the complexity of the work of the world that is currently experienced by the professionals in various disciplines and fields, the students must have an educational process through an advanced teaching model, learning experience and achievement, content and process to develop and improve their learning results. Advanced students must receive comprehensive input that allowing to a range of students that might include suggest that they are working longer hours and finding with a more flexible model (Gray, 2010).

Research in 1970s suggest that the traditional process could suggest to various degree about teaching and learning in higher education that suggest that this was conducted in the context of quality teaching approaches and technologies. In addition there are many methods which are being used today in form of computer-based learning, distance learning, blended learning, modular learning, programmed learning, project method, third step and more method, communication method, individualized instruction, Modular teaching is a new approach to classroom teaching for experienced learning in universities or institutions and it has been getting more consideration. The concept of learning in modular has varied over a period of 20 years of development. Teaching through modules is a self-learning in flexible teaching and particular input sets. It could be defined which are being benefit to the learner and may be divided in the learner's own-desired pace. Therefore, regardless of the time pressure are available for the entire programme of selected learning in the classroom. Consequently, it may not be used as an in-class. The delivery of teaching through this approach has technological, cultural and social new ideas.

In a study that more interesting includes with a variety level of educational technology institutions that in the last few years, technology advances leading to the development of new models of learning. Through the technology domain in their structure. According to the same source, the approach today's generation of their education and technology using the participants. The last challenge facing university students in the higher education is difficulty from social and culture, some social class teaching, technology, especially those who have no sufficient skills in computer, English, mathematics and reading. Singh (2002) points out the teaching and learning with the online technology. Participants in higher education are challenged. He suggests that there is a tremendous for online technology development beyond the need to be recognized as social learning learning skills. The focus is the change of modular which more part of programme in higher education. This study was focused to test the effectiveness of modular approach in teaching in order to assess the student learning performance and achievement.
