Balance

This design principle is about creating a visually pleasing composition by balancing its versatile elements in terms of size, shape, color, texture, etc.

Rhythm

Rhythm is concerned with arranging different elements in a composition as a means to promote the feeling of movement, flow, irregularity, and dynamism; invoke a particular emotion in viewers (e.g., serenity, excitement, etc.).

Unity

This design principle states that all elements in a composition should be connected and unified to create an aesthetically pleasing and well-balanced whole.

Hierarchy

Hierarchy implies the arrangement of design elements into a clear visual structure in the order of their importance; from most important to least important.

Contrast

Contrast is used to emphasize differences and create visual interest by applying two or more elements that are disparate in value, size, color, texture, or direction.

Emphasis

This design principle is meant to draw attention to significant elements of a composition, making them stand out from the rest.

Proportion and scale

Proportion is the ratio of elements and how they fit in relation to one another, while scale refers to the size of those elements compared to their environment.

Movement

This principle refers to the use of such visual cues as size, shape, and color to create a sense of motion and direction.

Pattern

A pattern consists of recurring elements and concepts that create a consistent visual language within a design.

Efficiency

The principle of efficiency is based on minimizing the amount of effort and resources needed to achieve a goal or complete a task.
