Transactions of the Institute of Indian Geographers ,1993 Regional Development and Internal Migration Aspects of Structural Transformation Askar Mukashov, James Thurlow,2023 This study investigates regional development and internal migration dynamics within the context of modern structural transformation in Sub Saharan Africa We develop a regionalized Computable General Equilibrium model that incorporates regionalized production endogenous interregional migration and distinct migrant households Using this model we simulate the structural transformation of Senegal as a case study Our findings demonstrate that agricultural stagnation exacerbated by global climate change underlies the economic underperformance of rural regions and amplifies regional income disparities Furthermore our analysis shows that outmigration from stagnating rural provinces to a more developed capital region positively influences overall economic growth and mitigates regional income inequality Nevertheless these effects are limited and a proactive approach to addressing income inequality across the nation s regions would require supporting agriculture as it represents a more equitable policy than promoting nonagricultural sectors in both rural and capital regions
