

Transmission Lines

- Electrical power is transferred from generating stations to consumers through overhead lines and cables.

Electrical Characteristics

(a) Overhead lines

A transmission line is characterized by four parameters: series resistance  $R$  due to the conductor resistivity, shunt conductance  $G$  due to leakage currents between the phases and ground, series inductance  $L$  due to magnetic field surrounding the conductors, and shunt capacitance  $C$  due to the electric field between conductors.

Series Resistance ( $R$ ). The resistances of lines accounting for stranding and skin effect are determined from manufacturers' tables.

Shunt Conductance ( $G$ ). The shunt conductance represents losses due to leakage currents along insulator strings and corona. In power lines, its effect is small and usually neglected.
