

We have to keep in mind that the age  $p$  is only a model age. If we compare this age with the real age of the mineral (the time the galena was crystallized) and find them close together, we can only say that the history of the sample agrees with our model.

In two cases we found a discrepancy between the age given by the geologist and our model age; we found  $p = 350 \times 10^6$  yr, while the geology allows for the deposit no more than  $30 \times 10^6$  yr because it lies between very young chalk.

A possible conclusion is that the mineral was separated from the magma 350 million years ago, tramped around and settled 30 million years ago on its place today; in other words, it is not a primary, it is a secondary or tertiary deposit.

TILTON: These model ages of anomalous leads will cause your leads to go to negative values. When you call one lead 330 million years and one 350, isn't there really any guarantee that one is not just a slightly anomalous lead?

PAUL: A negative age may be caused by a loss of Pb or U in the magma. Such anomalies do not lead always to a negative age. They can be recognized by the  $\mu$  and  $\kappa$  values of the sample.

RUSSELL: The thing that has bothered me--and I have seen some of these figures before--is the  $\pm 50$  millions you can put on these ages. That is pretty small. What does it mean? It doesn't jibe well with the 90 to 430 difference you have mentioned.

PAUL: Between these limits, 90 to 430 million years are all measured galenas from Germany.

RUSSELL: But on each age you say  $\pm 50$  million and yet this age is going to depend very much on the  $4.45 \times 10^9$  yr. How do you calculate the 50?

PAUL: Only on the error in the measurements. Not on the error in the age  $W$ . It gives only a shift in the time scale.
