1 Introduction

The effect of monomer organization on polymerization and polymer properties is illustrated by a critical survey of some typical polymerization experiments conducted in certain organized systems. For comparison, in most of the cases, the same polymerizations are performed under isotropic conditions. Monomer organization may prove, at least in principle, of critical importance in polymerization and it can be achieved in various ways including the use of thermotropic liquid crystalline media,¹⁻² orientation at liquid-liquid interfaces,³ and organization in micellar⁴⁻⁶ or vesicular media.⁷ It should be noted that these organized media are interrelated and recent findings established the fact that common molecular structural features lead to the formation of organized systems either in the bulk or in the dispersed phase. On the other hand, in discussing organized polymerization, we proceed from thermotropic liquid crystalline media to polymerization at liquid-liquid interfaces and then to micellar and vesicular phases to coincide with the historical development of the subject, and perhaps with the increasing complexity of the respective media.

The significance of polymerization in organized media is primarily attributable to its resemblance to biological reactions, which usually occur in organized systems.⁷ Furthermore, monomer organization may affect polymerization kinetics, polymer structure, and specifically microstructure, a polymer property that is directly related to the organization of the reacting monomers. Among the polymers of scientific and technological value prepared by polymerization in organized media, are liquid-crystal polymers⁸ and polymeric surfactants,⁷ which, depending on their molecular structure, may form intra- and/or inter-molecular micelles⁹ or polymerized vesicles.⁷ The latter aggregates retain the vesicular structure of their monomeric counterparts and since they exhibit sufficient stability
