Tetlock, 2011 We examine whether a simple quantitative measure of language can be used to predict individual firms accounting earnings and stock returns Our three main findings are 1 the fraction of negative words in firm specific news stories forecasts low firm earnings 2 firms stock prices briefly underreact to the information embedded in negative words and 3 the earnings and return predictability from negative words is largest for the stories that focus on fundamentals Together these findings suggest that linguistic media content captures otherwise hard to quantify aspects of firms fundamentals which investors quickly incorporate in stock prices
