T. Mao, 1969 Capital Budgeting Practices Including the Impact of Inflation John M. Boersema, 1978 Official Gazette Philippines, 2013 Technical Resource Management: Quantitative Methods Marvin J. Cetron, 1969 Traditional research management methods the authors contend are too unsystematic to continue to control the funding and allocation of men money and materials in research Today research and development R the authors believe they work and this book gives an overview of the most significant resource allocation techniques now being used in government and industry Among the suggested strategies for planning are rigorous goal identification sample budgeting time apportionment and selection of those research paths which give the greatest over all payoffs The authors emphasize that hard choices must be made and that research projects must be assigned a value rating so that most promising ones are given priority while less important ones are deferred The allocation of funds represents one of the most difficult but also one of the most fruitful aspects of the decision making process One of the methods for making such decisions is the Methodology for Allocating Corporate Resources to Objectives MACRO which has been used in Europe as well as in the U S Another procedure now being employed by the Air Force Flight Dynamics Laboratory involves the use of computerized planning programs Only research that has been carefully planned will yield the most significant technological advances Yet development must be just as carefully managed for its cost may be phenomenal and a wrong start could be catastrophic Finally the authors consider technological forecasting which must be accurate enough to provide the judgment necessary to prevent over extension of resources on the one hand and incipient obsolescence Here as in current planning rigorous management control must be practiced
