Abstract. It has been 20 years since the formation of buildingSMART International (then the International Alliance for Interoperability) and the commencement of the development of the Industry Foundation Classes (IFC). Initial uptake of the Building Information Modelling (BIM) concept and the IFCs was very slow, but it is now moving into the mainstream in developed countries. BIM is not as advanced in some countries such as Malaysia that are moving rapidly towards developed status. This paper will review the use of BIM by Quantity Surveyors in both countries that follow the “English” tradition and those, such as the US, which have developed other approaches. It will examine the capabilities of some of the BIM-based cost estimating software as the basis for understanding the use of BIM by Quantity Surveyors. This will include Quantity Surveyors who are using BIM to provide a traditional estimating service, as well as those firms that are applying the new technology to changing roles in cost estimating and cost planning. This will provide the basis for suggestions as to how Malaysian QS firms can exploit this technology.

1 Introduction

BIM technology has become increasingly well-known among construction industry players throughout the world. It is acknowledged as having contributed towards the success of projects due to its more efficient and effective working practices. This includes its contribution in the preparation of construction cost estimates, the most valuable quantity surveying practice in determining the project costs. BIM is claimed to offer a significant advantage in improving the estimating practice that is often prone to errors and inaccuracies [1]. BIM technology potentially provides a better quality of data by automation of information documentation [2-7]. More specifically, BIM has much to offer when it comes to improving cost estimating reliability, including early schedule information, quicker predictions of cost impact of design changes, better understanding through improved visualisation, as well as the possibility to access additional information for documentation [8]. 3D as-built models containing rich data are replacing traditional 2D methods; BIM creates information integration with a seamless flow of information from the initial phase to the final stage of the life cycle [9]. Information is integrated by the BIM models’ controlling the information in a shared repository to establish consistent, accurate and accessible data [2].

Currently, construction industry practice widely employs BIM [10] and its implementation is increasing from year to year [11, 12]. USA, Finland, Denmark, Norway, Netherlands, UK, Australia, Hong Kong &

Singapore are among the countries heading towards significant BIM uptake [13]. Malaysia, where the growth of BIM has been driven mainly by the private sector since 2009 [14], has made slow progress in developing BIM systems [13], the level of implementation falling on 0 and 1 of the BIM scale [15], indicating the need for a solution in those issues. Thereby, CIDB, as the professional body that has been given the mandate for managing BIM uptake in Malaysia, has urged BIM implementation amongst the construction players in their practice to produce more effective construction projects [16, 17]. Despite the efforts to encourage BIM usage amongst managerial and operational teams in the Malaysian Construction Industry, CIDB (2013) has reported that the slow level of transformation towards BIM could be due to the lack of standardised BIM processes and the absence of guidelines for its implementation. Hence, the CIDB has emphasized the BIM guidelines to be provided for the construction industry users for better communication and work collaboration [14]. Apart from the CIDB emphasising the provision of BIM guidelines for the industry users, Quek (2012) has specifically suggested the Royal Institution of Surveyors Malaysia (RISM) especially Quantity Surveying (QS) Division, to initiate appropriate actions in evaluating the influence of BIM.

Therefore, this paper aims to overview the impacts of BIM on the role of the Quantity Surveyors. The research method adopted for this paper is a comprehensive literature review of BIM capabilities pertaining to quantity surveying practice specifically in achieving more
