

Richard Rorty

Richard Rorty is perhaps the best-known living philosopher in the Pragmatic tradition, and one of the most talked-about thinkers of the present day. He is a philosophy professor at Stanford University. Giancarlo Marchetti chatted with him about his ideas and his hopes.

How did you come to study philosophy?

When I was a teenager, I read Plato and Nietzsche, and thought about the issues between them. I think this is a fairly common way in which people come to take an interest in philosophy. And I happened to go to a university where philosophy was very popular. It was taught in all the courses so it was a sort of natural career to go into.

Who in particular influenced you during your early studies?

Various teachers at the University of Chicago: Leo Strauss, Charles Hartshorne, who was a student of Whitehead, Rudolph Carnap, quite a few different people.

Which philosopher do you especially admire and why?

I think the one I admire most is William James. He never lost a sense of humor about his own writing. He wrote because he enjoyed it. There's a kind of joyful exuberance to his work that I wish I could imitate.

May I ask you how you write? Do you revise frequently?

Oh, probably not as frequently as I should. I usually write a draft and then write a second draft and then polish that draft up in the course of a few weeks or months.

Let's turn to philosophy. Could you say what characterizes your own version of pragmatism?

I think that what I get out of reading the classical pragmatists is just the idea that there are no privileged descriptions and that therefore there is not much point in asking, "Is our way of talking about things objective or subjective?" I think of pragmatists as the people who did the best job of getting rid of the subject/object distinction.

In what way does your pragmatism differ from that of Hilary Putnam?

I'm not sure. Putnam wants something he has called substantive truth. And I'm not sure what 'substantive' means in that phrase. He wants some kind of correspondence that I don't see any need for, but I've never been quite clear what sort of correspondence it is.
