

The Land Surface

This portrait of our Planet Earth reveals the land masses in their most beautiful dress. It shows the three main types of forests: the tropical rain forest belt around the equator, the broadleaf deciduous trees of the middle-latitudes and the needle-leaf high-latitude forests which almost girdle the earth in the Northern Hemisphere. Many of the grasslands and middle-latitude forests are being cultivated, and much of the drier semi-desert areas are used for grazing. Low ground cover, which consists mainly of mosses and lichens, is found in the Tundra and mountain areas.

The Ocean Floor

For the first time on any globe, the ocean floor is dramatically revealed in full color as it would appear if the water were transparent. This was accomplished through the talents of skilled cartographic artists plus the latest authentic, scientific information.

The Mid-Atlantic Ridge is shown as an enormous mountain range over 10,000 miles long. Generally the peaks of this Ridge lie about a mile or so below the level of the sea but a few peaks reach the surface and form islands such as the Azores.

In the Pacific many more peaks reach the surface forming thousands of islands. The deepest point in the world, 36,198 ft. deep, is over a mile deeper than Mt. Everest is high. Thousands of underwater physical features such as seamounts (mountains), trenches (valleys), etc., are clearly delineated and named. The major ocean currents are named and their direction of flow is shown by an arrow.
