

MUSIC TEACHING STYLE

IDEAS AND IMPLICATIONS

Alan J. Gumm looks at dimensions of music teaching style and at how teachers can understand and adjust their style to balance personal, curricular, and student needs.

BY ALAN J. GUMM

The term “teaching style” has been used by educators to mean a number of things, such as specific, effective teaching behaviors, traits related to personality, ways of matching student learning styles, and the interpersonal skills of a teacher. Which is it? The answer is that teaching style is not just one thing, but rather several things that function collectively. In other words, it is not individual aspects of teaching considered in isolation but the entire pattern of teaching considered at once that reveals teaching style.

Any aspect of teaching viewed singularly, or microscopically, does not reveal teaching style—considering the meaning beyond those teaching behaviors is essential. Music teaching style can only be defined by viewing teaching macroscopically and gleaning new information at that level.

“Teaching style” and “teaching behaviors” are not interchangeable terms. Teaching behaviors are chosen to meet changing needs from situation to situation and from rehearsal to rehearsal. In contrast, teaching style is pervasive and ingrained in the teacher’s approach and drives the conscious decision making toward consistent patterns of instruction. It is founded in relatively stable characteristics, such as personality, learning style, background, and philosophical beliefs. Decisions of what and how to teach, therefore—in a broad sense—do not change drastically over time.

To adapt to new directions or advance to new heights in this profession, change must be sought at the style level and not at the behavioral level. Common discussions with music teachers depict the stable and macroscopic notions of music teaching style. Music teachers, when asked where they learned their successful techniques, often answer that they borrowed them from many sources based on how the techniques suited their overall goals in teaching music. In other words, the specific techniques used were less important than the personal goals that led to the use of those techniques. This indicates that new techniques did not change music teaching style, but rather were adapted into it. There is something in every person’s way of teaching that goes beyond the specific teaching behaviors they use—it is their music teaching style.

Though music teachers may be aware of the specific teaching behaviors they use moment to moment, they may not be directly conscious of how their music teaching styles function in the rehearsal. They may also be unaware of alternatives to their styles. Without an understanding of music teaching style, teachers will not make decisions as purposefully as they could.

Examining both the dimensions of music teaching style and the possible music teaching styles within the profession can lead to a macroscopic view. The dimensions are the component parts of the overall style. Music teaching style is that which is revealed by the overall pattern of the dimensions. Although this theory is based on the self-perceptions of high school choral music directors, the primary notion and much of the content may be applied by music educators who are involved in teaching school music ensembles.

Dimensions of Style

The dimensions of music teaching style represent various manners of interaction between the teacher, students, and music subject matter. They offer
