ABSTRACT

Despite significant changes in the treatment of common eye conditions like cataract and age-related macular degeneration, reading difficulty remains the most common complaint of patients referred for low vision services. Clinical reading tests have been widely used since Jaeger introduced his test types in 1834. A brief review of the major developments in clinical reading tests is provided, followed by a discussion of some of the main controversies in clinical reading assessment. Data for the Salisbury Eye Evaluation (SEE) study demonstrate that standardized clinical reading tests are highly predictive of reading performance under natural, real world conditions, and that discrepancies between self-reported reading ability and measured reading performance may be indicative of people who are at a pre-clinical stage of disability, but are at risk for progression to clinical disability.

If measured reading performance is to continue to increase in importance as a clinical outcome measure, there must be agreement on what should be measured (e.g. speed or comprehension) and how it should be measured (e.g. reading silently or aloud). Perhaps most important, the methods for assessing reading performance and the algorithms for scoring reading tests need to be optimised so that the reliability and responsiveness of reading tests can be improved.

1. Introduction

In the early 1990s we obtained data from 1000 consecutive patients referred for low vision evaluation at the Johns Hopkins Wilmer Eye Institute low vision service (Unpublished data). An intake questionnaire asked each patient to indicate the primary reason for seeking referral to low vision. The results are shown in Fig. 1. The most common reason for referral was difficulty reading, which applied to over 60% of patients. The second most common reason was difficulty driving, applicable to only 5% of patients. Similar results have been published for other populations (see, e.g. Elliott et al., 1997).

Since 1990 there have been significant improvements in the treatment of eye disease – most notably the introduction of anti-VEGF therapy for neovascular (“wet”) AMD. Yet reading difficulty continues to be a primary concern for patients referred for low vision services. In a small but detailed study of patient expectations prior to low vision rehabilitation 14 of 15 patients with AMD reported that reading difficulty was a primary concern (Crossland et al., 2007). Although we are inclined to interpret these findings as an indication of the importance of reading in everyday life, there is another possibility – that patients with reading difficulty are referred to low vision services because low vision rehabilitation is most likely to improve reading performance through the prescription of magnifiers. Other problems such as driving or recognising faces are more difficult to address with current technology and patients with these problems may not be referred.

But in support of the “reading is important” explanation it is also worth noting that most commonly used questionnaires for assessing the various aspects of vision disability include one or more items on reading difficulty. Popular instruments such as the ADVS (Mangione et al., 1992) VF-14 (Steinberg et al., 1994), NEI-VFQ-25 (Mangione et al., 2001), Massof Activity Inventory (Massof et al., 2005) and many others include an item about difficulty reading newspaper, and entire questionnaires have been developed just to evaluate reading performance such as the Reading Behaviour Inventory (Goodrich et al., 2006). Moreover, measured reading performance is among the best predictors of patient-reported visual ability (McClure et al., 2000) and vision-related quality of life (Hazel et al., 2000).

Reading performance has been used as the primary outcome measure for several clinical trials on the effectiveness of low vision rehabilitation (see Binns et al., 2012) and as a secondary outcome measure for clinical trials of pharmaceutical and surgical treatment of various eye diseases including laser photocoagulation (Macular Photocoagulation Study Group, 1991), submacular surgery (Hawkins et al., 2004), anti-VEGF (Tufail et al., 2010) treatments for AMD, and comparison of intraocular lenses following cataract
