

In the story 'Blackout', Roger Mais addresses the power dynamics of race and problematises racial bias with the paradigm of gender. The illustration of inequalities inherent in both race and gender is pronounced by the author's decision elements of superiority and inferiority to both the characters. The encounter between a white woman and a black man, in the backdrop of racial tension, gives the reader an insight into the negotiations of power relations between race and gender hierarchies.

Mais establishes a strong ground for the construction of the character's psychology by describing their state of mind through their actions. The woman, feeling safe in the "wave of panic", reflects her privileged position. Her air of condescending calmness is what the author stresses at as it is the very thing that is brought crashing down. The "approach" of the "black" man is narrated in a style that sets the tone for story in a way that leaves the reader as expectant and worked up as the woman herself. The geographical setting of the story is a deliberate choice on part of the author to further the complexities that he introduces into the theme of race, class and gender. The manner in which a foreigner behaves in a country based on a monologist discourse of racial superiority is pitted against the violence and political unrest which cease to pose any danger to this foreigner just because she is American.

By making the encounter about cigarettes, Mais brings the issues of race and class superiority at the convergence of the simple act of smoking. In expressing racial bias through something commonplace and mundane, Mais exposes the atrocity of racism and the utter baselessness of its underlying 'logic'. The movement of the cigarette, from the lady's hand to the man's face, to the gutter with a flick and then back to the man's hand demonstrates the balance of power in the story. The act of throwing the cigarette away that results in the black man's censoring stare causes the racial issue of the story to coalesce with gender. Mais brings out not only stereotypical assumptions related to race but also gender which intersect to achieve a semblance of balance in power between the two characters. The man is able to go beyond his racial "inferiority" by drawing strength from the masculine attitude that his gender allows him to adopt. In the beginning of the story, the man's conduct is quite frank and reflects presumption of normalcy in a black man approaching a white woman at night on a bus stop. For the woman, on the other hand, he goes expectations of normalcy which makes her nervous and agitated at the same time. Mais, therefore, destabilises the belief of normalcy that racism internalises in people.

The continual negation of the woman's expectations, right from the man's approach to his reproach of her throwing the cigarette away, is intentional as it is the only way in which the man (and the author) can rail against the discrimination and harassment that has taken such a deep seated position in people's psyche. The woman's act of throwing the cigarette highlights that she has "plenty" while the man is saving a half for later. Juxtaposition of "half" and "plenty"
