Conclusion

It is important to take into account that other factors than the injury itself may influence the outcome. We have shown that the sick-leave pattern prior injury is such factor which should be considered in rehabilitation. This stresses the importance to consider the person who gets a TBI and not only the pathology.

Introduction

Traumatic Brain Injury (TBI) is a large cause of death and disability in the world. In Sweden every year approximately 22.000 individuals get TBI. In US the number is 280.000 injured, and 80.000 get permanent functional impairment.

Methods

Data of persons with was collected from the emergency ward at Sahlgrenska University Hospital and from the Swedish Social Insurance Office. Included were persons between 16 - 64 years, that year 1999 and 2000 had been diagnosed with TBI manifested as the diagnose ICD 10, S06.2-S06.3 in the hospital data base. Data from the same persons were gathered from National Social Security Office to assess the amount of days with sick-leaves for the persons. The persons were followed 1999-2005 to explore which factors that impact on outcome. The sick-leave pattern from one year before trauma to four years after trauma was also analysed.

Results

250 individuals (195 men / 55 women) were diagnosed according to our criterions.

At trauma, 69 individuals (27, 9%) were on sick-leave, which could be compared with 1,4 % in the general Swedish population. 33 individuals got other compensation from society and 148 individuals no compensation from society. The sample was divided into two groups, those on sick-leave at trauma and those productive at trauma. In the sick-leave group 81,2% still were on sick-leave four years post injury, compared to the productive group, 35,6% were on sick-leave four years post injury.

There is no difference between the groups in, age, sex or length of intensive care and in length of rehabilitation in hospital.
