Handout: 1

In this series of four handouts we will provide information to help you get started using Microsoft Access. This program has many capabilities and these handouts only provide a brief introduction!

1. Planning the Database

In creating a new database, the most important step is planning and considering what you want to be able to do. Take your time with this step. Sketch out your ideas and share them with others. The answers to these questions will help determine what you can and cannot accomplish with your database. You will need to consider:

What is the smallest unit you want information on? For example, do you want to have information on each class or on each individual in the class? Each record will hold information on this unit.

What pieces of information do you need to keep? Be practical and think about what you have time to deal with. Also consider how you will keep track of changes in the information. How will you know when information needs to be updated?

In what form should you store the information (numbers, text, dates)? You should store numbers that are not used in computations (+, -, *, /) as text fields. For example, you wouldn't add telephone numbers or zip codes, so those should be stored as text.

Which specific fields do you need? For example, do you want just a Name field or do you want a First Name and Last Name field so that sorting can more easily be done alphabetically by last name.

Can information stored in one table be linked to another? For example, if you need information on a person's department, a list of departments can be stored in one table and then linked to an individual.
