

3. The Electromagnetic Pump. Magnetic forces acting on conducting fluids provide a convenient means of pumping these fluids. For example, this method can be used to pump blood without the damage to the cells that can be caused by a mechanical pump. A horizontal tube with rectangular cross section (height  $h$ , width  $w$ ) is placed at right angles to a uniform magnetic field with magnitude  $B$  so that a length  $\ell$  is in the field. The tube is filled with a conducting liquid, and an electric current of density  $J$  is maintained in the third mutually perpendicular direction. Show that the difference of pressure between a point in the liquid on a vertical plane through  $ab$  and a point in the liquid on another vertical plane through  $cd$ , under conditions in which the liquid is prevented from flowing, is  $\Delta p = J\ell B$ .
